An inquiry needs a path, not just a reply.

The everyday situation

A property advertisement brings someone into WhatsApp while the agent is in a viewing. Later, the agent returns to several conversations, asks similar questions and tries to remember which person needs attention first. The problem is the work between receiving interest and preparing a useful response.

Trace one recent inquiry

Choose an actual inquiry and note when it arrived, when it received a useful answer, which details were collected and who took responsibility. An automatic greeting is not the same as a useful answer. Mark where the customer waited or had to repeat information.

Look for a repeatable improvement

Start with one source, such as a property campaign, and one destination, such as a named advisor. Define what should happen if the advisor is busy. A clear fallback is more useful than assuming somebody will notice the message.

TRY THIS TODAY

Review five recent inquiries. Record the missing detail or unclear responsibility in each. Choose the most common problem to improve first.

Ask what changes the next conversation.

Keep the intake focused

The first exchange should help the advisor understand the request. Collect details in a natural order, answering the buyer's question when accurate information is available. Avoid turning every inquiry into a long questionnaire before offering any help.

Useful details to consider

Property or listing of interest; purchase or rental; preferred area; approximate budget; timeframe; financing questions; preferred language; and the next step the buyer wants. Ask only what is relevant. Unknown information should remain unknown rather than being guessed.

Example - fictional buyer

Alex asks about a two-bedroom apartment in a particular area. The stated budget is $180,000, the intended purchase is within six months, and financing is undecided. The advisor now knows to confirm availability and discuss financing before proposing a viewing. These details are an illustration, not a client result.

A SIMPLE RULE

Every intake question should help answer a customer question, route the inquiry or prepare the next action. If it does none of those, consider removing it.

Give the advisor a brief they can use.

A practical inquiry record

Include the customer's name and contact, original listing or source, stated requirements, unanswered questions, responsible advisor and next action. Retain the conversation so the advisor can verify a summary. A summary supports judgment; it does not replace it.

Make the next action specific

For Alex, the action might be: Maria confirms current inventory, then contacts Alex at the agreed time to discuss suitable options. "Follow up" alone leaves too much undecided. A person, an action and a time make responsibility visible.

Protect accuracy

Assign someone to keep prices and availability current. If a listing has changed or a question requires specialist advice, refer it to the appropriate person. Before launching a workflow, test unavailable properties, unanswered questions and requests to speak with an agent.

BEFORE YOU LAUNCH

Confirm that a person can take over, the automation respects that handoff, and the advisor sees the details already provided by the buyer.

Measure preparation before promising sales.

Use a small weekly review

Select a consistent sample of inquiries and record: time to useful attention, presence of relevant buyer context, assigned advisor and completion of the next action. Track unanswered or incorrectly answered questions separately so they can be corrected.

Interpret the results carefully

If context is complete but nobody follows up, the next improvement is team responsibility. If the agent receives incorrect information, fix the information source. More appointments or sales may also depend on inventory, pricing and the agent's work; do not attribute every change to the intake system.

Your first improvement plan

Write down one inquiry source, the questions that matter, the person who maintains property information, the handoff rule and the weekly review owner. Use those decisions to define a manageable first implementation.
